The application needs to support running on two different environments, one on test and one on production, where different configurations are used. The application shall be able to switch the connection to the service during runtime and the service should detect that the application is running on different environments and adjust accordingly. I'm currently investigating using Spring to connect to the service during runtime, and found Spring AOP which seems like a good match for this. I have some code that does the following: @Autowired @Qualifier("production") Service service; @Autowired @Qualifier("test") Service service; public void setService(Service service) { this.service = service; } This works fine if the application is executed on the test environment. In case it's the production environment, the TestService will be used. I'm having some issues if the application is executed on the production environment, and a TestService gets injected: @Autowired @Qualifier("test") TestService service; @Autowired @Qualifier("production") Service service; public void setService(Service service) { this.service = service; } The problem is that the TestService gets injected, so the application works fine, but when the application is executed on the production environment, the Service class is initialized with the TestService 2edc1e01e8
